INTRODUCTION

IT would be out of place in the introduction to a work intended entirely as a book of reference, and which will not probably come under the eye of the general reader, to enter into any apology, if it were needed, for the study of Heraldry: it is too valuable an auxiliary to the full understanding of many branches both of literature and the fine arts to be neglected by students of either. It frequently happens, however, that when a coat of arms is met with, either verbally blazoned or delineated by the painter or sculptor, difficulty is experienced in ascertaining to what family it belongs. The purpose of the present work is to enable the student to overcome this difficulty, so far as Scotland is concerned, by giving a complete list of the arms recorded in the official Register of that country, arranged in such a way that they can be easily identified. But before entering into any explanation of the arrangement of the book, it may be as well to glance at the history of the registration of the arms themselves.

Persons invested with the official rank of Heralds appear at a comparatively early period of Scottish history. Whether or not we are to believe the statement of Sir James Balfour, that the Lyon King of Arms and the Heralds attended at the coronation of Robert II. at Holyrood, on the 23rd of May 1371, it is certain that "Lyon Herald" existed very shortly after that date, as in the Exchequer Rolls mention is made of the payment of a certain sum to such an officer in 1377;[1] and on 8th April 1381 a warrant was issued in London for a license to "Leon Heraud" of the King of Scots, authorising him to take away a complete suit of armour which he had bought in that city.[1] The duties of Heralds in early times were multifarious: they had the regulation of all combats, tournaments, funeral ceremonies, and state pageants, and were frequently the bearers of despatches from their Royal master to neighbouring sovereigns. But not the least important of their duties was the supervision of the armorial bearings of the different families in the kingdom. It is doubtful whether in early times there was any official register kept; but some such list was probably drawn up by the Lyon. The earliest Scottish armorial now in existence is that said to have been prepared by, or under the superintendence of, Sir David Lindsay of the Mount about 1542. It is impossible to say whether it took from the first an official character, but that there must have been some such recognised record before the close of the sixteenth century is clear from several references which are made to the Liber insigniorum or "Book of Arms" in the Acts of the Scottish Parliament at that period.[2] In 1592 an Act was passed authorising the Lyon and his Heralds to hold visitations throughout the realm in order to distinguish the arms of the various noblemen and gentlemen, and "thaireftir to matriculat thame in thair buikis and regesteris."[3] It is unfortunate that this permission to make heraldic visitations was never largely taken advantage of: had it been, and had the registers indicated in the Act been properly kept, it is unlikely that the Privy Council would have within the next forty years practically authenticated as an official record Sir David Lindsay's MS. above referred to, which they did in the following terms:—

"This Booke and register of armes done by Sir David Lindesay of the Month, Lyone King of Armes, reg. Ja. 5 conteines 106 leaves which register was approvine be the Lordis of His Majesties most honorable Privie Counsale at Halierudehous 9 December 1630.

Whatever may have become of the official registers previous to the date of the commencement of the present one, it is certain that many collections of arms were from time to time made both by the officers of arms and others. Sir Robert Forman, Lyon (1555-1567), presented to Queen Mary a roll containing 267 Scottish coats of arms. In addition to the "Workman MS." now in the Lyon Office, at least four other armorials belonging to the sixteenth century and relating to Scotland are in existence, and were shown at the Heraldic Exhibition held at Edinburgh in 1891, while the seventeenth-century collections are comparatively numerous. As time went on, however, the absence of an authentic and official Register of arms was more and more felt: in 1639 the Committee on Articles appointed the Lyon to do diligence for cognoscing and matriculating all arms, and to represent the same to the Privy Council, that they might take some course to prevent arms being assumed irregularly. In 1662 it was apparently found that the registration of arms was more neglected than ever, though Cromwell had appointed one if not two Lyons during his administration of the Government. By an Act passed in that year it was provided inter alia that "... considering what disorders and confusions have arisen and are dayly occasioned by the usurpation of cadents who, against all rules, assume to themselffs the armes of the cheeff house of the familie out of which they are descendit, and that other mean persones who can nowayes deryve thair succession from the families whose names they bear as they have just assumed the name doe therafter weare the coat of that name to which they pretend without any warrand or grund whatsumever, ... no younger brother or cadent of any familie presume to carie the armes of that familie bot with such distinctions as shall be given be the Lyon King of Armes;" and it was likewise provided that all persons were to have their arms examined and renewed by the Lyon and inserted in his Register. This Act, however, did not remain long on the Statute Book: considerable dissatisfaction appears to have been created by it, possibly from the amount of the fees which it entitled the Lyon to exact at the funeral solemnities of the nobility and their wives, and it was repealed in the following year, 1663. It is not very clear whether the above-quoted allusion to the Lyon Register can be taken as implying that at that time there was such a record in existence, or whether it merely means that a Register was then to be commenced. But as the present Register was certainly commenced within the next ten years as new, it may fairly be inferred that no official register of arms, with the exception of Sir David Lindsay's MS. mentioned above as having been approved by the Privy Council, was in existence at the period of the Restoration. What had become of the old registers, if such there had been, has been a matter of some speculation: both water and fire have been held to be answerable for their destruction. It is by some thought that they may have formed part of that cargo of records, originally carried off to London by Cromwell and ultimately jettisoned from the frigate Eagle, or lost with the ship Elizabeth of Burntisland when, owing to the representations of the Scottish Parliament, they were being restored to their proper home. On the other hand, Arnot in his History of Edinburgh mentions that the Lyon Office Records were burned in a fire which took place about 1670, and that the Act under which the present Register was instituted was in consequence passed shortly afterwards. As, however, there is no mention whatever made of any such fire in that Act, which merely alludes in general terms to the "many irregularities of these late times," it can hardly be regarded as authentic history, and it is unnecessary to do more than allude to the causes which have been thought likely to have induced the Scottish Legislature to take the steps they did for the formation of an entirely new Register. It has been shown that an attempt had already been made in 1662 to improve the registration of arms, but it had come to nothing. In 1672 the Parliament again addressed themselves to the subject, and this time with success: they had the advantage of a member who was himself well acquainted with Heraldry, Sir George Mackenzie of Rosehaugh, and he not improbably took a special interest in drawing the Act, which took its place on the Statute Book as the Act of 1672, cap. 47.[1] It ratified generally the Act of 1592, so far as it related to visitations and the penalties to be inflicted on persons assuming arms without authority, and it ordered all persons, of whatsoever degree, who were in the habit of using arms to give in a description of such arms and of their lineage to the Lyon Clerk, in order that they might be distinguished with "congruent differences," and that the Lyon might enter them in his books and registers, and might grant arms to "vertuous and well-deserving Persones." The Register now instituted was to be considered as the true and unrepealable rule of all arms and bearings in Scotland, and was ordered to remain in the Lyon Office as a Public Register of the Kingdom for all time coming. All persons who used arms after the expiration of a year and a day from the passing of the Act rendered themselves liable to a fine of one hundred pounds, and the goods on which the arms were engraved were to be escheat to the king.

The Register constituted by the above Act still continues to be the "Public Register of all Arms and Bearings in Scotland," and no persons of Scottish descent whose arms are not registered in it have a right to armorial bearings unless they can prove that they represent families whose arms are known to have been in existence previous to 1672. The importance of such a record is so evident that the following description of its principal features may not be out of place. It originally consisted of one large thick folio volume of 592 pages, now bound in two for convenience in handling. It begins with the arms of the Lyon Office, followed by the personal achievement of Sir Charles Erskine who was Lyon at the time. Then follows a page occupied solely with the words "Anno Domini 1678"; this date is probably explained by the entries having been originally made on loose leaves, and bound together when the authorities thought a sufficient number of arms had been given in. On the next page is the title, not unskilfully done, in large German text and ornamented with scroll-work in pen and ink. Then comes another title-page more in detail, which runs as follows:—

"The Principall Authentick and Generall Register of the Armes in Scotland collected, visited, distinguished and authorized be the Honourable Sr. Charles Areskine of Cambo, Knight and Baronet, Brother german to the Right Honourable the Earl of Kellie, late Lyon King of Armes, In the years of God 1672, 1673, 1674, 1675, 1676, and 1677, conforme to the several warrants and extracts given under his hand and Seale of office; and that in pursuance of the 21 Act[1] of the 3rd Session of the 2nd Parl. of our dread Soveraigne Lord Charles the Second be the grace of God King of Scotland, England, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, &c., and of the 125 Act of the 12 Parl. of His Majesties Royall Grand-Father K. James 6 of ever blessed memorie; and be virtue of the power contained in the Patent given to him be his said sacred Majestie, which Register be the first forecited Act is declared to be the unrepealable rule of all Armes and Bearings in Scotland and publick Register of the Kingdom to remain with the Lyons Office and to be transmitted to his successors in all time coming: to which are added the armes authorized be Sr. Alexander Areskine of Cambo, eldest lawful sone to the said Sr. Charles and present Lyon King of Armes after his father's decease. The several atchieve-ments being blazoned at the special sight command and direction of the said Lyons Kings of Armes be Master Robert Innes."

Mr. Robert Innes seems to have had a special fondness for title-pages, as he gives us yet another which informs us that the first part of the volume contains the arms of the King and the Duke of Albany and York, the prelates, peers, and lesser barons of Scotland, "at least of such of them," he adds, "as have matriculat" in conformity with the Act, "the rest being only named and their coats left blank." We have then the blazon of the arms of the King of Scotland, the Royal Badges and Symbols of the Kingdom, the arms of the King of Great Britain, followed by the Badges of Great Britain; after these the Register proper begins with the arms of the Duke of Albany and York, followed by all the members of the peerage as above mentioned. In too many cases it is only the name and title which appear, a space being left to be supplied with the blazon of the arms which were never sent in. It is much to be regretted that the nobility of Scotland did not set an example of obedience to the law in transmitting their arms to the Lyon to be duly entered. Had this been done by them, and by some of the oldest families in Scotland who are also unrepresented in the Register, the latter would have possessed a completeness to which it cannot now pretend, while many interesting and important facts in the family history of the country would have been preserved. We can only regret that there are so many blanks in the recorded arms of the Scottish peers. The next division of this volume of the Register consists of the arms of the baronets, knights, and proprietors of free baronies, arranged under the letters of the alphabet corresponding to their names. At the end of each letter a few leaves have originally been left blank to admit of additions, and these have been filled up from time to time. At page 236 another alphabet begins, the opportunity being of course taken to have another ornamental title-page. This list contains the arms of the "gentlemen" of Scotland, and extends to page 454, where the Royal Burghs are given. Many of the latter, however, merely show blanks beneath their names. Then follow the blazons of the arms of certain incorporations, and the volume from page 486 to the end is taken up with what are styled "promiscuous matriculations"—the first is dated 1765 and the last 1804; but many matriculations between these dates are to be found in the pages originally left blank at the end of each letter as mentioned above,

The volume contains altogether about 2702 entries, and has been fairly well kept, though some of the later writing is not very good; there are a great number of erasures and not a few other minor errors. These were carefully noted by Robert Boswell on his entry to the office of Lyon Depute and Lyon Clerk in 1770, and he prefixes a formidable list of them to the Register. He seems to have begun his work with high ideals, and there is a long note stating the principles upon which he was determined to keep the Register, and exhorting his successors in office to adhere to the lines thus laid down. With all his anxiety, however, and his undoubted success in discovering and noting all the erasures, interlineations, and blanks which occur, he has not unfrequently missed some obvious errors in the blazons themselves.

It may be mentioned that there are very few of the arms given in this volume actually painted, the only exceptions being at the beginning of each letter, when the arms relating to the first entry are painted in the margin, and a few added in modern times, when an old patent has been presented which had not been previously registered. The regular emblazonment of the arms in colours did not begin till 1804, when the second volume of the Register was commenced. In this volume there are at first four matriculations to the page, the arms being depicted on the margin in plain colour without metal, and destitute of either helmet, mantling or motto scroll. In a very few years the size of the shields is increased, and only three entries are given on a page, and sometimes indeed two. About 1808 an interesting and suggestive change comes over the Register. The cloud of war loomed over Europe, and many brave cadets of Scottish Houses found an opportunity in the Peninsula of carving out a career for themselves with their swords. We find this well reflected in the pages of the Register at this period, a period when unfortunately Scottish heraldic art shared in the lack of merit which generally prevailed. Up to 1815 the achievements of successful soldiers are constantly decorated with their medals and other honours received for military prowess. Not only so, but more pointed allusions to the wars were often introduced: take, for instance, the case of Colonel Campbell of Fassifern, who got a grant of arms and supporters in 1814. After detailing his lineage, the entry gives the following account of his blazon :—

"Gules three Bars or, on a bend ermine a Sphinx between two wreaths of Laurel proper and on a chief embattled a representation of the town of Aire in France, all proper, in allusion to the glorious services of the said Colonel John Cameron on the second day of March last, when after an arduous and sanguinary conflict he succeeded in forcing a most superior body of the enemy to abandon said town and subsequently received an address from the inhabitants expressive of their gratitude for his strict maintenance of discipline and thereby preserving them from plunder and destruction. Crest, Issuant from a mural crown or an arm in armour, the hand grasping a dagger, all proper, and in an escroll above this motto, 'Pro Rege et Patria:' on a compartment below, on which is this motto, 'Mayo,' in allusion to the signal intrepidity manifested by the said Colonel John Cameron on the 25 day of July 1813 in defence of the pass of Mayo (sic) in the Peninsula, are placed for supporters on either side a soldier of the 92nd Regt. of Highlanders, the exterior hand of each supporting a musket, the bayonet fixed, all proper."

Not content with this elaborate coat, Colonel Cameron actually applies the very next year for an alteration on his achievement, with the effect of making it still more bewildering. The Sphinx on the bend is now placed between the badge of the Royal Portuguese Military Order of the Tower and Sword and the gold medal "presented to Colonel Cameron by command of the Grand Segnior" for his services in Egypt; an additional crest is granted representing a Highlander waist deep in water, with a sword in one hand and a banner with the cypher "92" on it, and above all the word "Arriverete," the latter being the name of a place where the gallant officer had forded the river Gave de Mouline "in face of a very superior body of the enemy." From the bottom of the shield are suspended three medals, and the word "Maya" appears on a scroll below. This is merely a specimen of several similar achievements which may be found in the following pages.

Mention has been made above of the decay of Heraldic Art: it was certainly at a low ebb during the early part of this century. It is even yet capable of much improvement, but a modern herald would hardly pride himself on composing a coat like the following, which appears in the Lyon Register under date 9th July 1812: "Argent, a saltire and chief azure, the last charged with a dexter hand proper, vested with a shirt sleeve argent issuing from the sinister chief point holding a shoulder of mutton proper to a lion passant or, all within a bordure gules"! Another abuse which was prevalent at the period now under consideration was in connection with the carrying of supporters. The Lyon, or rather the Lyon Depute of the time, conceived that he had a right to grant supporters to all and sundry who applied for them, and accordingly either embodied them in new grants of arms or as additions to old ones. But this did not last long, and in the subsequent volumes of the Register the grants of supporters are rare, and are not given without some reason or authority shown.

It is unnecessary to enter into further detail about the remaining volumes of the Register; it is sufficient to mention that in the third volume a new departure was made in the method of painting: hitherto the achievements had been depicted in plain colour and without helmets or mantling; now they were emblazoned with metal and colour, and the flowing folds of the lambrequin added dignity to the representation. The only drawback to the use of metal has been that the silver is apt to turn black, but it is believed that this has now been overcome by the substitution of aluminium. The mantlings were invariably painted "gules doubled argent," and for long were of a very wooden and tasteless character. Of late, however, they have been painted the livery colours of the shield, and a great variety of form has been introduced, copied from the best specimens of Gothic Heraldic Art. Altogether, so far as artistic merit goes, the Lyon Register will compare favourably with any modern specimens of armorial design, and as time goes on the increasing interest taken in Heraldry merely as a decorative art, apart from its scientific value, may be trusted to tend in the direction of making it still more a thing of artistic beauty.

After all, however, it must be kept in view that the Register is not a book of pictures or ornamental design. It is to the genealogist and the student of Heraldry that it will yield up its richest stores. To the latter, indeed, it is full of interest. Although the Scottish School of Heraldry has been called the simplest in the world, yet there are arms in the following pages which reveal some rich curiosities. Not to speak of eccentricities like the leg of mutton alluded to above, there are examples in the Register of some rare and interesting blazonry. The fillet which occurs in the arms of Ramsay of Barnton (p. 73) and Scot of Craigmuie (p. 18) is of very rare occurrence in British Heraldry, and it is curious to find it twice repeated within a few years in this record. The mysterious adumbration or shadowing which occurs in some of the Hamilton coats, is also interesting, because rare, though it hardly bears out the statement of some writers that it was adopted by families who, having lost their possessions, and consequently being unable to maintain their dignity, chose rather to bear their hereditary arms adumbrated than abandon them altogether. Another very uncommon practice is that of "emborduring" a coat, that is, surrounding it with a bordure of the same tincture as that of the field. Several Scrimgeour coats are thus treated (pp. 168, 169), and another more modern one, Sligo of Auldhame (p. 210). Emborduring was well known to the old heralds, such as Gerard Legh, but it is rare, indeed, to find it put into practice in modern Heraldry. Of tinctures not usually employed may be mentioned sanguine in the arms of Clayhills of Invergowrie (p. 21) and purpure in those of Campbell of Craigie (p. 80), and Storie (p. 167); the last mentioned coat is also remarkable as affording what is probably the only instance in British Heraldry of a single tressure flory. The use of armes parlantes, or canting coats, does not prevail to any excessive extent in the Register, probably because the Scottish names do not afford much scope for such display. The older heralds, however, seldom lost an opportunity of having a sly joke, if possible, when granting a new coat, witness the azure bordure charged with eight "pills" or, which surrounds the coat of a Dr. Donaldson, apparently practising in Paris (p. 118); or the savage head between three combs displayed in the arms of Rochhead (p. 136), the combs being evidently intended to be applied in the mitigation of the "rough-head" alluded to in the original form of the patronymic.

An interesting instance of what the older heralds call Arms of Patronage, or Arms of Affection, occurs in the case of Mr. Deas Thomson, Accountant-General of the Navy (afterwards knighted), who in 1810 recorded arms the third quarter of which consisted of those of Lord Barham, "which," it is stated in the entry, "have been granted to him the said John Deas Thomson by the special consent and approbation of his Lordship, and are assumed by him as a mark of respect and gratitude on his part for the affectionate regard shown to his mother Katherine Deas, and distinguished patronage manifested to himself by that illustrious nobleman." Lord Barham (as Sir Charles Middleton) succeeded Lord Melville as First Lord of the Admiralty, and no doubt had the opportunity of being useful to his friends and relatives.

Such are a few of the leading features of the Lyon Register, which forms one of the most important genealogical,[1] as it is the only heraldic,

[1] The Lyon Register contains the pedigrees of many families contained in the different entries record in Scotland. It now consists of twelve volumes, and the list of arms contained in the present work (including those added at the end as entries made while the book was printing) has been brought down exactly to the close of the twelfth volume. It only remains now to indicate the lines on which the work has been planned, and the way in which it should be consulted.

The arrangement adopted by Papworth in his large and most useful "Ordinary" has of course suggested that adopted in the following pages. But in a book of the dimensions of this it was thought unnecessary to go into the minute subdivisions that Papworth found essential. Only some, therefore, of the more largely-employed ordinaries, such as the Bend, Chevron, Fess, Saltire, etc., and one or two charges, such as Lion, have been subdivided; and a list of the sub-heads will be found under the principal heading of the ordinary or charge. With regard to the blazons, or, to use less technical language, the entries containing the descriptions of the arms, they are, primarily, arranged under the first-mentioned charge in the blazon, thus: "Azure, an anchor in pale argent" will be found under Anchor; "Gules, a fess argent," under Fess, and so on. Under each heading the various entries included in it are arranged after the following manner, in the first place alphabetically, according to the tincture of the field of the shield: Argent comes first, followed by azure, ermine, gules, or, vert; then the entries which begin, say, with Argent, are placed as follows: All the undated coats (not quartered) come first in the alphabetical order of the persons to whom they belong. After 1804 every entry is dated, and almost every entry after 1677, so as a general rule it may be taken for granted that all entries without a date attached belong to a period previous to the last-mentioned year. Following the undated coats come in order of date the other unquartered arms whose blazon begins with the same tincture; then the quartered coats on the same principle, each quarter being treated as a separate and distinct entry, except when it is repeated in the same coat. All the

of the arms. At first the entries are very short, and contain few, if any, genealogical details beyond stating in a general way that the person to whom the entry relates was descended of a certain family. More and more details were, however, inserted in course of time, till the information at one period became both irrelevant and cumbersome. Of late years the particulars given in the various entries regarding the descent of the patentee or person matriculating arms may be relied on as correct, care being taken not to put in anything as a statement of fact which has not been proved. In this way the Register becomes of much use genealogically, which is important, as the Register of Pedigrees is unfortunately not taken advantage of to that extent which it might be.

first quarters coming under the same tincture of field are put together, then the 1st and 4th, the 2nd, the 2nd and 3rd, and lastly the 4th, the counter-quarters being put immediately after the quarters of which they are counter-quarters. In the blazon of a quartered coat the words following the brackets in which the numbers of the quarters are contained (e.g. 1st and 4th quarters) always apply to the whole shield, unless when the contrary is specially mentioned. Thus "Argent, three mullets gules (1st and 4th quarters), all within a bordure gules," means that the bordure is round the whole shield; while "Argent, three mullets gules, within a bordure of the last (1st and 4th quarters)," signifies that it is only the 1st and 4th quarters round which the bordure is placed. It may be noted that, in order to avoid confusion, it has been thought better to repeat the tinctures of bordures and the like in the case of quartered coats when they apply to the whole shield, instead of using the ordinary formula of "of the first," "of the second," etc.

There are certain details which have been omitted from the blazons of the arms, which are so conventional in their nature that they must be understood to be there. For instance, swords must always be considered to be "hilted and pommelled or," unless where the contrary is expressly stated; lions, too, are presumed to be "armed and langued gules," unless the field or the lion itself is gules, when it is langued azure. Three charges on a field are to be supposed to be arranged two and one, unless otherwise indicated. Stars, except when their rays are wavy, have generally been included under the head mullets, and mullets pierced have been grouped as spur-revels.

As regards the names of persons occurring in this volume, it may be stated that, as a general rule, they have been printed in the text according to modern usage; in the index the modern form appears first, followed, in brackets, by the various spellings which occur in the Register. Cross references are also given to the different forms which occur. This seemed to be the common-sense way of treating this matter, as few persons would, for example, look up Aberbuthnot for Arbuthnot, or Cahn for Colquhoun. Besides, it must always be kept in view that names were, at a period not so long gone by, spelt more by sound than by any fixed rule. The names of places present more difficulty in their treatment. One may know very well what the modern form of a personal name should be, however curiously it may at one time have been spelt; but when names of lands come to be dealt with, the difficulty of deciding what the proper spelling should be is much increased. The best course to take seemed to be to leave the place-names spelt as they are in the Register. No doubt readers with local knowledge will find out some curious varieties of names with which they are familiar, but to have attempted to give them as they exist at present, if they exist at all, would have been certain to lead to still more blunders.

I have to express the obligations which I am under to Mr. J. W. Mitchell, Rothesay Herald and Lyon Clerk, for much assistance given while these sheets were preparing for press. I have also to thank my son, Mr. J. W. Balfour Paul, for very useful help in the preparation of the Index.

The figures in italics denote the pages on which a name occurs in italics as relating to some quarter of a coat only.

The names have generally been arranged under the modern spelling, with the variants appended in brackets, and the use of cross references will, it is hoped, obviate all difficulty in tracing a name under any form.

For numbers marked * see Errata.
